Vol. X. Numb. 13.

THE OBSERVATOR.

The Examiner's Charge of infatiable Avarice upon the D. of M in his Paper of the 8th Inſtant, confuted and retorted. His Parallel of Craſſus unjuſt: his Character more applicable to ſome of the Examiner's own Friends, and the Omen of his Fate more juſtly to be expected on ſome of 'em, as that of Cyrus from Semiramis is more due to the French Tyrant.

From Saturday, February 10. to Wednesday, February 14. 1711.

Countrym. YOU have ſeen the Examiner of the 8th inſtant, Maſter: Pray what do you think of his Craſſus, and the Letter he has fram'd to him? His Party hug it extremely, and think he has paid off a certain Great General very handſomly.

Obſ. His Malice and theirs againſt that Great General has diſcover'd it ſelf in many Inſtances, Roger; but ſtill it turns upon themſelves. They are mad at their Diſappointment, that he is again to command the Army; and having fail'd to ruin him by a Charge of no leſs than a treaſonable Ambition, they have now eſſay'd to make him hateful to the World by a Charge of incurable Avarice: but by their ill Succeſs in the former, we may gueſs at the Event of the latter.

Countrym. He thinks to eſcape, Maſter, becauſe he has nam'd no body.

Obſ. If he have no better Subterfuge than that, Roger, 'twill ſtand him in little ſtead. His Papers, Numb. 17, & 20. beſides ſeveral others, are Keys ſufficient to let us into his Meaning; ſo that if ever that Great Man ſhould think it worth while to proſecute him, the Libeller has laid himſelf open enough. But I would adviſe the Examiner, who pretends to be ſo well vers'd in Roman Hiſtory, to conſider how the Romans would have treated an Incendiary, that ſhould have preſum'd thus to aſperſe any General they were ſending out to join their Confederates againſt Pyrrhus or Mithridates, &c. We may gueſs, by their putting the Idol Faſcinus under the Triumphal Chariots of their Generals to preſerve them from Calumny, how they would have rewarded ſuch a foul-mouth'd Slanderer, who, as 'tis expreſs'd by a Declaimer againſt Saluſt, delights like a filthy Hog to wallow and skirmiſh in the Puddle of Calumny with every body.

Countrym. 'Tis a Surprize to all Mankind, Maſter, that this Libeller ſhould be ſuffer'd with impunity to traduce and beſpatter a Perſon of the firſt Rank, who under her Majeſty's Auſpices has rais'd the Glory of the Nation higher than ever; who is ſo univerſally eſteem'd by all our Confederates, that they ſcarce think any thing can be well perform'd in Council or Camp without him; and who has been ſo much bleſs'd with Succeſs, that he never yet fought a Battel or undertook a Siege, but he came off victorious. One would think that every body ſhould honour one whom God has honour'd ſo much, that the Examiner's Pen ſhould drop from his Hand, and that his Conſcience, if he had any, ſhould fly in his face, when he offers to accuſe ſo Great a Man of unmeaſurable Ambition and Covetouſneſs; who, were he tainted with thoſe two ill Qualities, could never have been ſo ſteady in the Intereſt of her Majeſty and his Country, as to withſtand the Temptations of ſatisfying both, that Lewis XIV. is able to lay before him.

Obſ. I take that to be a Demonſtration of the Falſhood of the Charge, Roger: for certainly had the French King thought him capable of ſacrificing the Publick to thoſe two criminal Paſſions, he that reckon'd it worth his while to laviſh Gold out of the Bag to bribe King Charles and King James II. againſt their own Crown and Dignity; who advanc'd large Sums to Harlots for corrupting the former, and who was at the Charge of entertaining Prieſts and other Tools to work upon the Bigotry and Weakneſs of the latter; could never have been ſo far wanting to his own Intereſt, as not to have tempted our Great General with all that Ambition and Avarice think valuable, had there been the leaſt probability of Succeſs. The Nation has not yet forgot that King Charles II. was ſo far bewitch'd with French Ladies and Gold, as to prorogue and diſſolve Parliaments, and to change his Miniſters at the pleaſure of the French Court; that Lewis XIV. advanc'd him great Sums to penſion Parliaments, and to bribe the hungry T—ys againſt the Intereſt of their Country, which was never yet found a difficult Task: then why ſhould we think he would not attempt that Great Man, whom this venomous Slanderer does ſo much abuſe, did he think it poſſible for his Ambition, Avarice, or Reſentments for ill Treatment, to warp him from the Intereſt of his Sovereign and Country?

Countrym. Your Arguments are ſuch, Maſter, as muſt weigh with every Man of Senſe, who is not ſo far gone in prejudice as to be out of the reach of Conviction. In the mean time the Examiner, and thoſe who prompt him, arraign the Wiſdom of her Majeſty and the whole Confederacy, for putting all that is valuable to them in the power of a Man who is capable of betraying them at once, were he guilty of thoſe enormous Paſſions he is ſo villanouſly charg'd with. No body can think the Houſe of Auſtria ſo weak as to entruſt their Honour and Intereſt in the hands of ſuch a Man, when they know the French King is ſo capable of overbidding them at the market. To be a Duke, Peer, and Mareſchal of France, and Hereditary Governour of any of their Provinces, is a much fairer Bait for Ambition and Covetouſneſs, than to be Prince of Mindelheim, or of any thing elſe in the power of that Family to give him, with any proſpect of continuance; ſince the Conſent of the Empire and of their Allies muſt be had to confirm or make it durable: whereas the French King is under no ſuch Reſtraints, but can beſtow Honour and Wealth as he pleaſes. The Faction have made a mighty noiſe about a Propoſal to make the Duke General for Life, tho we have nothing but their own word for it. Can any Man think then, if ſuch a Poſt could debauch him from his Duty, that the French King and the Court of St. Germains would not give it him under their Broad-Seals? The Loſs of one ſuch Army as he has been entrusted to command, would, in the Esteem of Lewis XIV. the Pretender, and Duke of Anjou, be Merit enough to advance our General to be Hereditary Viceroy of Milan, Flanders or Catalonia; the least of which would bring him more Honour and Profit than to be General of Great Britain during Life, and is such a Temptation, as none of the Allies are capable of laying before him.

Obs. I am satisfy'd, Roger, that if the Faction thought him corruptible, they would put a higher Value upon him: but the Malice they express against his Grace, and our other Generals, that have been firm to the Interest of the Revolution, is enough to convince any Man that their Success and Honesty is the great Grievance and Terror of the Party, as well as of our common Enemy.

Countrym. We have said enough, Master, of the Confidence which the House of Austria puts in our Great General, to shew their just Esteem of him. To which we may add the Value which our Neighbours the Dutch express for him: Every body knows how jealous that State has always been of the Great Princes of the Family of Orange, tho William the First and Last gave such Proofs of their disinterested Affection to their Country, as are scarce to be parallel'd in History. Can any Man think then, that so wise and jealous a Republick would trust their All in the hands of a Man, that can set no Bounds to his Ambition and Avarice, and has it in his power to ruin them in the twinkling of an Eye, by betraying the whole Confederate Army to the French? The Faction has been so malicious as to suggest, that he expos'd our Troops to Slaughter on purpose to accomplish his ambitious Designs, but we have heard no such Complaints from our Allies. They are not so far bereft of their Senses, as to believe Contradictions; they know he has expos'd himself as much as any private Centinel in the midst of the Enemies Fire, who how dextrous soever they may be, are not yet arriv'd to such a height of Skill, as to teach their Bullets to distinguish betwixt a Friend and a Foe in the Heat of Battle. But that which is a greater proof of our General's Integrity, and other noble Endowments, is her Majesty's steddy Resolve to imploy him still in that great Post, notwithstanding the Floods of Malice which the Faction every day vomit against him.

Obs. I think you have said enough, Roger, to confute their malicious Charge. But pray what do you think of the Examiner's Crassus? has he been lucky in his Parallel?

Countrym. Much as he uses to be, Master; for every one who knows the Story of Crassus, will find more of his Character applicable to some of the Examiner's own Friends than to any body else: if we may believe Plutarch, Salust, Florus and others, who knew him as well as the Libeller, he was very much suspected, if not really concern'd, in Catiline's Conspiracy, to murder the Chief of the Roman Whigs, to set their City on fire, and to overturn their Constitution. He was one of those who envy'd Pompey, for being prefer'd to the Command of the Roman Army before himself, and was a Patron to all such leud Men as disturb'd the Government. Besides Roger, the Examiner is so unhappy in his Parallel, that Crassus, when entrusted with the Command of an Army, made War upon the Parthians, merely for the sake of their Riches, not only without the Consent of the Commonwealth, but contrary to the Treaties betwixt the Parthians and the Romans; whereas our General makes War with the Consent of Queen [illegible] ment, against the common Enemy of [illegible] makes a Sport of Oaths, Leagues and Trea[illegible] instead of fighting him for the sake of [illegible] Spoils, contents himself with the Honours [illegible] Rewards confer'd upon him by his Sovereig[illegible] liament; and is so far from discovering a[illegible] ment at the turning of his Family and Re[illegible] of Posts, that he engages as readily in the [illegible] his Queen and Country as ever: So that [illegible] manner of Parallel betwixt the two [illegible] the Examiner has forg'd a Letter on pur[illegible] him up in a Bear's Skin, that the T— Bl[illegible] may bait him.

Obs. Then I perceive the Examiner has [illegible] unlucky in his Crassus, Roger, since the Ch[illegible] the Man turns upon some of his own Exp[illegible] are so unmeasurably covetous and ambitious, [illegible] can't endure any body should have H[illegible] Wealth from the Sovereign but themselves.

Countrym. If there be any Parallel betw[illegible] Master, 'tis in this, that the Faction of Pa[illegible] swearing and swearing Jacobites, and othe[illegible] arbitrary Principles and restless Passions, [illegible] Duke and his Army to Destruction, for t[illegible] the Pretender, and their French Mode of [illegible] and Government; but with this remarka[illegible] rence, that Crassus and his Army were, a[illegible] ting out against the Parthians, vow'd to th[illegible] Destruction of their Enemies by Metellus th[illegible] of the People, because his insatiable Cov[illegible] which made him hateful to God and Man, [illegible] gag'd him in that War, contrary to solema[illegible] and without their Consent: and accor[illegible] Curse took effect; Crassus and his Son were [illegible] Army routed, and his Head being carry'd t[illegible] thian King, he order'd melted Gold to be p[illegible] his Mouth, since he could never have his [illegible] during his Life.

Obs. Blessed be God, Roger, we have no [illegible] afraid of the Omen, but ground to hope [illegible] trary; and that as the groundless Curses [illegible] aminer's Faction have hitherto issu'd in [illegible] Confusion, they may do so still. All h[illegible] will pray that God would be pleas'd to [illegible] Duke with his wonted Success against the [illegible] raoh, and that if God has not destin'd [illegible] Tyrant to Repentance, that his Head m[illegible] his Cruelty, and be thrown into a Vessel [illegible] as Semiramis threw that of Cyrus, with this [illegible] just Sarcasm, Take a full Draught of Blood, [illegible] since you always thirsted for it.
